

The Club That Kept You Out Is Now Open

How Scalare Partners Is Democratizing Early-Stage Investing on the ASX

August 2026

The most profitable investments in modern history have one thing in common: most people were never allowed in.

Canva. Atlassian. Afterpay. The names are familiar because they became giants. But before they were giants, they were seed-stage startups — small, unproven, and essentially invisible to anyone without an institutional mandate, an insider network, or a minimum cheque of $500,000 to write.

For retail investors, the math was simple: the early-stage game was not yours to play.

Scalare Partners Holdings Limited (ASX: SCP) is working to rewrite those rules.

MORE THAN A FUND — AN ECOSYSTEM

Scalare went public on the Australian Securities Exchange with a singular purpose: to give everyday investors direct access to a diversified portfolio of early-stage companies — the kind of deals that used to require a private introduction to even see.

The portfolio includes 23+ direct investments across fintech, health tech, artificial intelligence, logistics, advertising, education, and compliance. But equity stakes are only part of the story.

In March 2025, Scalare acquired InHouse Ventures — an online marketplace connecting startups with investors — for A$1.7 million. Six months later, it completed the A$5.5 million acquisition of Tank Stream Labs, one of Australia's most respected tech co-working operators, with locations in Sydney, Melbourne, and Adelaide housing more than 100 startups.

Add Fishburners, Tech Ready Women, Planet Startup, and the Australian Technologies Competition, and what you have is not a fund. It is a vertically integrated startup ecosystem with Scalare's equity at the centre of all of it.

THE NUMBERS ARE MOVING

Early-stage investing stories often require patience before the metrics arrive. Scalare is past that phase.

For the quarter ended March 31, 2026, the company reported revenue receipts of A$5.26 million — up 771% above the same period the year before. The company was also operating cashflow positive — a meaningful marker for an early-stage investment vehicle.

In July 2026, Scalare secured a convertible note facility of up to A$25 million from The Blackstone Mercantile Group Ltd. SAC, providing capital to accelerate its investment pace without disproportionate dilution. The investor is capped at 19.99% ownership — protecting existing shareholders.

THE ACCESS ARGUMENT

The case for Scalare is ultimately a democratization argument. Venture capital — the asset class that produced returns of 10x, 50x, and occasionally 100x on transformative companies — has historically been the exclusive domain of institutions and ultra-high-net-worth individuals.

Scalare changes the unit economics of access. For the price of a single share, an investor gains exposure to a diversified portfolio of 23+ early-stage technology companies, physical startup infrastructure generating real revenue, and an investment platform that is scaling rapidly.

And because SCP trades on the ASX, there is no lock-up, no illiquidity discount, and no minimum investment threshold beyond the price of one share.

The diversification itself is the hedge. Most startups fail. But a diversified early-stage portfolio only needs one or two companies to break through at scale to justify the thesis. The concentrated upside from even one unicorn outcome in a 23-company portfolio is transformative.

WHAT TO WATCH

- Shareholder meeting outcomes on the share consolidation and convertible note resolutions
- Progress on Tranche 2 and beyond of the A$25M facility
- Portfolio company milestones, particularly the GXE/InHouse Ventures platform expansion
- Quarterly cash flow reports for revenue trajectory
- New portfolio company announcements

“The club is open. The question is whether you walk in.”
